

Why is sustainability important?

Worldwide, the emphasis on sustainability is rapidly increasing among consumers, clients, and employees. People are seeking businesses that prioritize community support and environmental preservation, ensuring that their efforts and resources align with these values. Businesses are urged to assess their procurement, energy usage, waste management, transportation practices, and commitment to equity to mitigate their impact on climate change and social injustices.

These proactive measures not only benefit the environment but also enhance the overall performance of businesses. By implementing genuine and comprehensive sustainability strategies, companies can build trust in their brand, boost employee engagement, reduce operational expenses, and enhance their resilience against the escalating risks posed by climate change.

Here are some ways to get involved in this positive environmental movement at work:

- Host a Earth Day celebration: educate employees on earth friendly initiatives and programs
- Encourage recycling by providing recycling stations. Collect hard-to-recycle materials like ink cartridges, fluorescent light bulbs, batteries for recycling through United Electronic Recycling
- Transform your happy hour into a refreshing walk with the whole team
- Declutter your office inbox: not only will this free up storage space on your company's email servers, but it will also help save energy and reduce greenhouse gas emissions
- Create a Green team of dedicated staff who will lead sustainability initiatives
- Reduce paper usage by printing on both sides, using digital files or implementing a regularly paper shredding service where all paper is recycled afterwards
